Seattle Race and Social Justice Initiative (RSJI)

The Race and Social Justice Project [ RSJI ] is a program of Seattle City government. Its mission is to end systemic racism in Seattle, and to encourage full participation by all residents of our city.

RSJI has three goals:

- End race-based disparities within City government.
- Improve City services and community engagement.
- End race-based disparities in all communities of Seattle.

Improving services for immigrants and refugees

Improving access to services for immigrants and refugees is an important part of the Race and Social Justice Project. As part of RSJI, the City of Seattle provides free language translation and interpretation services on request for people when contacting the City for programs and services.

Racism: an American problem

Discrimination is a problem around the world. Some countries use religion to divide people; others use language; and some use tribal membership or nationality.

Institutional racism is a system of prejudice and power based on skin color and nationality. Today, laws protect people from illegal discrimination, yet people who are not white still experience the result of systemic racism. Race influences where we live, where we work, how well we do in school, how long we will live, and whether we will be involved in the criminal justice system.

RSJI: working together to end racism

RSJI is improving the way that the City of Seattle serves our residents, including immigrant and refugee households.

Please join the City of Seattle to work together to end racism. RSJI is a long-term project to improve our city for all of us.
